

Plagiarism is the act of using someone else's ideas, words, or work without proper acknowledgment, presenting them as one's own. It is considered a serious ethical and academic offense, affecting the integrity of education, research, and professional work. Plagiarism can take various forms, including direct copying, paraphrasing without credit, self-plagiarism, and even unintentional negligence in citing sources. With the increasing accessibility of information online, the temptation to plagiarize has grown, making awareness and preventive measures more crucial than ever.