

Plagiarism happens when we use someone else's ideas, words, or work without giving them proper credit, and present it as our own. It's not just a minor mistake—it's a serious ethical issue that can affect education, research, and professional life. Plagiarism can show up in different ways: copying text directly, rewording someone else's work without acknowledgment, reusing your own previous work without mentioning it, or even accidentally forgetting to cite sources.
